To whom it may interest,

This year I've seen progress in my writing skills, ENG2100 course has been the process for me to attack the weak points in my writing. With every activity I was in constant realization of common mistakes I made and things that I should do in order to make the things I need to happen using my writing. I've become a better reviewer of my own written ideas.

The first classes were the most important to me, because they made me re formulate the conception that I had of professional communication. They taught me to consider the most minimal elements of this type of written communication, the importance of the media, how to think about my audience, and writing formats I didn't know about.

The way I research now has also being changed, mostly because now I think more objectively on what I need to obtain, what can be useful.

I became less wordy past the middle of my ENG2100 class which I consider is one of the most important improvements to my general writing skills, yet I feel like I need to work more on being specific because I barely started. Another point that I'm working on is backing up my statements, and getting sure that my sources are serious and trustables.

My best work for the course was the design project. Although it wasn't anything stunning to the eye, I think my design accomplished to deliver a message in a simple language, the online document was easy to navigate through and all the design principles were applied. More than graphics and design my writing was based on research and the way I set the content was according to web article standards.

I was able to start applying things that I learned from Technical Writing activities to other subjects this semester, I found myself more than once reviewing my International Relations and Philosophy essays correcting them using the new skills I've learned. On Business Communication, not only my writing was involved, but after my second English design project, it affected the way I -or we, because we were a group- developed the final communications campaign. I ended up using C.R.A.P. for the video and the webpage of that communication campaign.

Thanks,
